SECTION 2

What Changed in the Market?

What is a prediction market probability? On platforms like Polymarket, people trade contracts that pay out if a specific outcome happens. The price of those contracts reflects the collective market view — expressed as a percentage. When more people buy "Yes", the probability goes up. When more sell, it goes down. These numbers are not official odds or forecasts.

SECTION 3

Volume & Liquidity

Volume is the total amount of money that has been traded on a market. A rising volume means more people are actively participating — buying or selling contracts. Liquidity is the amount of money available to be traded right now. High liquidity means it is easier to enter or exit a position. Neither figure is a signal of who will win.

SECTION 4

Teams to Review Manually

What does "manual review" mean? It simply means these teams showed enough market activity to be worth a closer look. It is not a recommendation to bet on them, trade them, or take any action. Think of it as a flag that says: "something moved here — worth paying attention to."

SECTION 5

Catalyst Watchlist

A catalyst is a known event or news item that might explain why a market moved — for example, a key player injury, a squad announcement, or a match result. When no catalyst has been confirmed, the movement is noted but left unexplained. Catalyst notes describe possible context only; they do not prove causality.

SECTION 6

Data Freshness & Limitations

Why does data freshness matter? Prediction markets move continuously. Data that is even a few hours old may no longer reflect the current market state. Fresh data is better than stale data — but fresh data does not mean correct data, and it certainly does not mean predictive data.

Partial Freshness Warning: Trends data is fresh and up to date. However, some auxiliary pages (specifically the public landing page) are currently stale and may not reflect the latest information. Always verify data directly from the source dashboard before drawing any conclusions.

Important limitations to keep in mind:

Fresh data does not mean correct data. Fresh data does not mean predictive data. Signal labels describe market movement, not future outcomes. Catalyst notes do not prove causality. Manual review is always required before drawing any interpretation from this report.
